

RESPONSES / COMMENTS (NON-CLINICAL) - PART 1RE: PadNet vs. Revo System (Marc Goldberg, DPM)

From: Alan L. Bass, DPM

I purchased the Revo system last year during the Midwest conference. One of my only criteria at that time was price. Knowing that it was about half the price of PADnet, I bought the Revo unit. I made the wrong choice. When I received the unit, there was really no on-site training or customer service. The one thing that I noticed was there was too much interacting with the unit: too many buttons to press, too much scrolling back and forth on the wave forms.

When I bought the unit, there was no interacting with an MD to interpret results. This may have changed now. After about six months, I investigated the PADnet unit. One of the things that I noticed right way was the ease of using the unit, and that my results were much more reproducible. In addition, the PADnet unit allows you to perform a higher level study that will detect disease more precisely. This will also allow you to bill for a higher level test. Biomedix also provides superior on-site training, and an MD to interpret your studies. Don't base your decision on price alone. I am glad that I switched. The unit is worth it.

Disclaimer: I am a consultant for Biomedix, the makers of the PADnet device.

Alan L. Bass, DPM, Manalapan, NJ, abassdpm@optonline.net